ing out, but he seen took to me, and in a surprisingly short time we became friends. He was in the next cabin to mine, and evidently wished so much to have been with me, that I tried to get another man to exchange, but he was grumpy about it, and I had to give it up, much to Carr's disappointment. Indeed, he was quite silent and morose for a whole day about it, poor fellow. He was a tall, handsome young man, slightly built, with the kind of sallow complexion that women admire, and I wondered at his preferring my company to that of the womankind on board, who were certainly very him. One evening when I was rallying him on the subject, as we were leaning over the side (for though it was December it was hot enough in the Rei Sea to lounge on deck), he told me that he was engaged to be married to a beautiful young American girl. I forget her name, but I remember he told it me—Dulcima Something—but it is of no consequence.

Nothing, he averred, was too good for readers by the kind permission of Harper significantly at me. "Now where would you advise me to keep them?"

"On you." I said significantly.
"But where?"
"My dear boy." I said, bardly able to refrain from laughing, "do as I do; nut them in a bag with a string to it. Put the string round your neck and wear that bag under your clothes night and day."

I put the beg into my pocket. He gave a long sigh as he watched it disappear.

"Now what you have got to do with that bag," he said, a moment afterwards, "I'm very much obliged to you," he replied. "I will take your advice this very night. I say," he added, suddenly, "you have them. But to a standstill, while the other flew at night. I say," he added, suddenly, "you have them. But to a standstill, while the other flew at night. I say," he added, suddenly, "you have the cab, and, catching Carr by the collist, and while the other flew at night of them for a good deal, but I suppose Carr did his best, but being only an American, he certainly made a would show you would like to come down into my cabin."
